To begin you go fairly steeply uphill into a forest mainly of alder and Douglas fir trees.

This part of the trail has a undergrowth mainly of sword ferns and some elderberry trees.

Soon you come to a set of stairs that was constructed by Washington Trails Association the stairs stop the trail erosion in this area and make it easier to get up the hill.

You soon reach a sign with an arrow, pointing to the right making this a directional trail. Continue climbing up the hill and the trees begin to change to larger Sitka, spruce trees, and Alder trees.

At 2/10 of a mile, you make a you meet a trail junction where you can turn left and just follow the half mile back to the parking lot or continue ahead for a nice view of the bay and the trail drops back down the hill.

At 0.6 miles you go through a small but deep gully and then climb up to a wooden bench to take a rest on and a trail junction where the right junction leads to an overlook of the bay and the left continues on through the trail.

There are red elderberries and salmon berries growing 10 to 15 feet high in this area.

The short side trail leads to a rooty and bad little section of trail to an overlook of the bay. Watch out for cliffs along this section of trail.

At about 0.9 mile into the trail you come to some really big Sitka spruce trees. One off to the left of the trail is truly massive.

Add about a mile the trail starts climbing back up the hill passing more, old growth Sitka, Spruce, and hemlock trees

Climbing up the hill at 1.2 miles you pass the junction for the short loop trail. Continue to the right through the forest to finish your hike.

The trail is somewhat rooty in places, but it did not seem muddy. There are some old planks over the wet sections of the trail and muddy spots have been replaced or repaired with timber stair boxes filled with gravel and a culvert.

A little more than a mile you'll come back to the Trail Junction back to the parking lot where you turn right and head down the hill to the parking area.

This trail is safe for dogs and small children, except for the overlook trail, which has some cliffs along it.

Enjoy the photos!!
